¿HÉROES O VILLANOS?

Esto es cierto, historia sobre nuestros héroes.

Daily Planet Reporter

That's right. Plural. HEROES. Heroes who believed they could make a man fly, heroes who believed they could make Christopher Reeve walk, and heroes who didn't care if he did either of those things ever again—they just loved him.

The kryptonite to the gut of this "Im is the home movies. There is footage never seen by anyone outside the Reeve family. Private moments that are deeply personal, and yet universal.

"Super/Man: The Christopher Reeve Story" gives us the kind of truth the S on his chest stands for.

CLARK KENT HABLA CLARO

"No son héroes, son la puta hostia"

That's Most of the world met Christopher Reeve when he lew off the big screen and into our hearts in the winter of 1978, with those piercing blue eyes, that disarming smile, and a simple Midwestern rural boy scout de- sire to help. The fame was instan- taneous. So was the pressure to be just as perfect in reality. "Everybody's looking for a hero," he said, "I am not a hero. That was a part. I played the part. I'm not that man." ... This wasn't justice.

If you live with a spinal injury or similar challenge—see this "Im. You will feel seen. You will feel understood. You will feel championed.

On March 30, 2009, less than four and a half years after Christopher Reeve's death, President Barack Obama signed into law The Christopher and Dana Reeve Paralysis Act. It promotes research, rehabilitation, and quality-of-life initiatives for the millions of Americans living with spinal cord injuries and paralysis.

People are walking today because of the research that the Christopher and Dana Reeve Foundation helped make happen. You see some of them in the "Im.

When Will Reeve lost his mom so soon after his father, the older half-siblings took care of him. Matthew acted as a father figure. Matthew and Alexandra's mother, Gae Exton, loved Will like her own son, and to this day, they are still close. Gae appears in the documentary and is touching in her courageous reliving of memories with Chris—both joyous and painful.

rest of his life, Dana Reeve—"Immakers Ian Bonhôte and Peter Ettegui trust that we can handle the truth. In so doing, they allow us to feel what the family really felt, not just the expected arc of "struggle/success/tragedy/victory" that has become the bland glossy biopic diet of modern stream-bait.

We have an almost uncomfortably close front row seat to the frail man being lifted from bed to chair to rehab pool to exam room, unable to breathe without mechanical means, unable to feel his wife hold his hand (while having the courage to speak honestly about his grief at never being able to make love to her again), unable to speak more than a few words at a time, a prisoner in a body which once hung fearlessly on wires over New York City and now can only gaze out his office window at the grass where his children play—and he never will again. There are many powerful moments where we in the audience feel near survivor's guilt. He deserved better. For the symbol of truth, where is the justice in this?
